

Announcing Stories From the Field in the American Journal of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene

The Journal is introducing a new category of papers titled, “Stories From the Field”. This category will highlight descriptive personal stories based on authors’ experiences practicing clinical tropical medicine, performing tropical medicine research, taking part in international health education, and/or delivering global health services. Preference will be given to articles that provoke thought, encourage new ideas, share innovative approaches, promote sustainability, highlight local efforts, or work to broaden perspectives of Journal readers.

All articles should inform our readers about the world, people, health, hygiene, disease, and the myriad of issues that impact tropical medicine and global health. Through sharing these stories, it is hoped that we can advance our thinking and improve the quality of research and healthcare that we provide. Submissions will be accepted through the Journal site at <https://mc.manuscriptcentral.com/ajtmh>.

Essays should be titled but have no section headings. The maximum length is 1500 words. The maximum number of authors is 3. If patients are discussed, they should be de-identified. Preapproval is not required before submission, but potential authors are welcome to request feedback on suggested topics before submission.
